

An Authoritative Look at
Book Publishing Startups
In the United States

Introduction

This study offers an overview of the book publishing startup scene in the United States. The core of the report is a detailed spreadsheet listing some 900 companies, mostly founded since Amazon launched the Kindle in 1997. What makes the spreadsheet particularly valuable is that it lists more than just the company name. For each company it also provides:

- Brief mission statement
- Type of product or service provided
- Funding
- Current operating status (whether still in business)

Just as importantly the report includes summary data that defines the scope of the book startup industry, including:

- Total funds raised by all startups
- Average per funded company
- Median per funded company
- % of startups with declared funding
- % of startups no longer in business
- % of Exits/Acquisitions/Mergers
- Number of IPOs

This offers, for the first time, a measurement of how significant the startup activity is to the larger book publishing industry.

I encourage you to pause here and turn to the spreadsheet for several minutes to get a sense of its scope and detail. (After page 8, or download it separately in Excel format.)

The Startup Listings

I began compiling this list in early 2012 after a presentation I made at the Tools of Change conference on the topic of startups.

At that time I learned that Michael Bashkar was maintaining a list of startups (<http://bit.ly/2irUvec>). His list however included just the company name and URL, had only 325 names and was not regularly maintained (last update March, 2015). I began work on my list, apprising Bashkar of my efforts.

In January 2014 I published a first version of my list which included 600 names. This is the “second edition” with 900, and with much more data about each company. I think I can call the list authoritative – I would be surprised if I’m missing more than a couple of dozen companies.

Definitions

I define the list as “book publishing startups”. In the same way that book publishing is diverse so are these companies. For the most part I’ve looked toward general trade publishing, including kids books. The startups, however, mostly target independent authors, not publishing companies.

What is a startup? In theory, of course, it’s a new business of any sort. And as defined above, a business that was started since roughly 1997. But I also recognize a kind of existential notion of a “startup” versus just a new business (“startupidness”?). For example 61 new indie bookstores opened in 2015, but they’re not included on this list. Startups tend to see themselves as a new type of business. It’s a loose definition.

I had to make a slew of judgment calls about which companies to include on the list. Here’s a look at some of the decisions made.

I wasn’t sure what to do with the big players – such as Adobe, Microsoft, Sony – who have played in this space and have provided impetus and/or enabling technologies. But they don’t seem to fit beside small independent startups and they’re not represented here. On the other hand Amazon, Apple, Barnes & Noble and Google all make appearances.

Educational publishing posed a dilemma. Most of the startups in the field of education are not “publishing startups” per se. Rather than bringing new types of electronic books to education they mostly are devoted to moving well beyond the book container. And so the educational companies listed have a more traditional view of educational publishing. (I was surprised to find 18 companies just targeting textbook rental/resale/price searches.)

Scholarly publishing was also a challenge because most of the startups in that space are providing new tools and services that go beyond book publishing, rather than replacing the existing publishing piece. Very few companies on the list have a scholarly publishing focus.

“Children’s” was a relatively easy category: included are only those companies that are explicit about rethinking children’s print books and of providing book-like entertainment to children in digital formats.

“Apps” make occasional appearances but after an initial flurry of interest a few years ago the activity in this sector died down rapidly. (Except of course ereader apps on mobile devices.)

The vast majority of the startups are US-based. I’ve included some international startups that include the United States as a core target market.

Categories

Here’s how the companies break down by categories:

Classification	#
Tools & Services	260
Original Content	131
Retail	94
Social	73
Discovery	70
Education	49
Marketing	49
eReader	43
Children’s	34
Free	28
Subscription	19
Textbooks	18
Audio	12
Unknown-N/A	7
Investment (i.e. Ingram)	1

As I describe on the attached spreadsheet I decided to go with about a dozen categories once I learned that if I became more precise I’d have over a hundred categories, many with just a few entrants. So I cut a broad swath.

When, for example, you look at companies classified as “Tools & Services” you’ll find everything from a “PDF to EPUB converter” to “Cloud-hosted publishing tools: all you need to produce an app.” “Retail” is any service that brings books from distributors to retailers or retailers to readers.

You see about 70 each for “Social” and “Discovery” – based mostly on whether one of those terms appears in the short description of the company. If what-to-read-next is the problem that many people seem to think it is, apparently it will soon be solved by one or more of these startups.

Background to Startups in the Book Publishing Industry

We can blame Steve Jobs for the glamour of high tech. You can start a computer company in a garage. We can blame Mark Zuckerberg for the glamour of dotcoms: you can start in your university dorm and be a billionaire by the time you turn 23. Blame the Internet for turning whole industries on their heads.

Add to that the notion of disruption, of disrupting hidebound industries. Book publishing certainly qualified as hidebound, in existence for centuries, little changed since the Second World War. Its sales were largely flat since the mid-90s.

And then Amazon. Its first foray into the publishing industry disrupted just the retailing of books. When Amazon turned its sights on electronic books and launched the Kindle, it legitimized the possibility of disrupting publishing itself. If Amazon could do it, it could be done. The defensive reactions of the traditional players seemed to prove that Amazon was right.

The final force is the growth of mobile since the launch of the first iPhone in 2007, just a few months before the Kindle. The iPhone led to the iPad which led to a host of other tablets. Now ereading had a rich array of enabling devices.

Why Are so Many Startups Failing?

We can try to evaluate the data in this report against broader success and failure rates across all startups in the U.S. But finding comparable data is tough. There's a problem in defining "success", "failure", "no longer in business" and so on. Should we look just at tech startups? At what point does "just an idea" become a "business"? Is it when the company registers to do business in its state? Is there a nominal amount of funding required to qualify? The bare qualification to appear on my list was just a website, a declared publishing focus, and some sort of announcement that alerted me to them in the first place.

CB Insights has paid close attention to these issues and notes that "startup death is surprisingly hard to identify. Many startups are essentially dead but limp along for years in zombie-like fashion." They found that 55% of failed startups raised $1M or less. 71% of the deceased lasted less than two years after their last funding round.

Analyzing reports of failed startups CB Insights found that the number-one reason for failure was the lack of a market need for their product (42% reported) followed by running out of cash (29%). More generally U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics show that most businesses that fail do so within the first two years (34%). After 4 years 56% have failed.

What Are the Startup Opportunities in the Book Publishing Industry?

With the proviso that if I truly knew the answer to that question I wouldn't be writing this report, I'd be working at a startup, here are a few thoughts.

The disruption motif seems unlikely to get a footing in book publishing, or at least in trade book publishing<sup>1</sup>. The novel works. The collection of short stories work. An autobiography in book form works. A dozen or so startups take on the challenge of reinventing the narrative book form, with little success. Self-publishing represents the alternative. But the prestige of professional publishing still holds its allure. We can only guess how many self-published authors would cheerfully join the club if offered a membership.

So what of this disruption we call self-publishing? According to Data Guy it turns out that it's about a $500 million business, which in itself is not much of an aggregate opportunity. As distributors Amazon and its competitors retain about a third of this revenue. Publishing services like Smashwords and Draft2Digital can claim about 10%. So startups with a focus on self-published authors are trying for a cut of $300 million in net revenue. Authors Earnings slices and dices in some interesting cross sections.

- Just under 10,000 authors (9,900) earn $10,000 or more per year from Amazon.com.
- Half of those earn $25,000+ per year.
- 1,000 indie authors who debuted in the last 3 years earn $25,000+ per year.

If we use $10,000 in earnings as a threshold for an indie author to be interested in the services of these startups, the target market is pitifully small. But aspirations being what they are, certainly many authors of more modest earnings will still pay cash to try to raise their standing. How many and how much is the question.

When I think about disruption, competition and opportunity I keep coming back to Netflix CEO Reed Hastings evocation of his competition:

If you think about your last 30 days, and analyze the evenings you did not watch Netflix, you can understand how broad our competition really is. Whether you played video games, surfed the web, watched a DVD, TVOD, or linear TV, wandered through YouTube, read a book, streamed Hulu or Amazon, or pirated content (hopefully not), <sup>1</sup> I've indicated that this report doesn't focus on educational or scholarly publishing. I'll note here that educational publishing is being disrupted, mainly because technology opens up a host of instructional opportunities that effectively replace or at least augment the traditional textbook. Scholarly book publishing remains largely in place, while scholarly journal publishing is being disrupted by Open Access and other developments (though the largest players are more than holding their own).

you can see the market for relaxation time and disposable income is huge, and we are but a little boat in a vast sea.

Some Additional Observations

1. The book publishing industry (in the United States) is not “collapsing” or “dying”. Revenue and profits have held more or less steady over the past decade. But there is no growth, and no obvious prospect for growth. Other than the somewhat muted introduction of ebooks there has been little technological innovation in the modern era (although “superstores” could be thought of an innovation, albeit one that didn’t originate in the book retail industry).
2. The big shift in publishing is the growth of self-publishing (primarily of ebooks). The self-publishing business now represents some \$500 million in consumer spending, the vast majority of that fiction ebooks. The U.S. trade book sales (all subjects) at roughly $6.7 billion in 2015, self-publishing has a 7.5% market share. I estimate that there are upward of 500,000 active self-published authors in the U.S. (many earning just a few dollars a year). This is the market that the majority of the startups are chasing.
3. It would certainly be interesting to work back from those numbers and try to understand the revenue opportunity based on an estimated annual spend by self-published authors for products and services.
4. The “entrepreneurs” in this study appear to have little depth of publishing experience to bring to their endeavors. The average qualification could be paraphrased as “a lifetime love of books and reading.” On the other hand there is a merciful absence of the “tech visionary and serial entrepreneur.”
5. Very few (15%) have any declared investment. The companies are mostly bootstrapped.
6. Many of these publishing startups are not just lean: they’re emaciated. In many cases there is no startup, per se; just a website and some good intentions. The marketing and promotion is minimal.

These companies should pause and reimagine how their company would operate if they had to actually earn their way to getting their business hosted online. What if they had to generate $25,000 in a single year without a website. How would they identify an audience? What would be the selling proposition? What would make a customer pay real cash for their product? Currently there’s a “if we build it they will come” mentality; that is usually fatal.

7. “Room for innovation” is quite different from “ripe for disruption”. It’s not that many of the startups think that they’re disrupting the whole publishing business. But several make claims of disrupting the reader’s role, the agent’s role or the balance of power between writers and retailers. As Elizabeth Spiers puts it, too many startups “think incumbent companies are using broken models because they’re idiots and not because the problems are not easily solved.”

Many of these startups are trying to fix a problem that doesn’t in fact exist. Books are a debugged technology. They work. Self-published authors arguably have access to all the services they need between Amazon's Kindle programs and a few of the larger self-publishing service firms like Smashwords and Draft2Digital. Seek to innovate not to destroy.

8. A “good little business” can be something quite different than a VC opportunity. It's another pitfall of the startup mentality. If more of these companies saw themselves as businesses committed to the long-term rather than as Davids slaying Goliaths, they might be able to stick around a little longer.

9. Wattpad is the company that has been the poster child for book publishing startups and yet ten years after its launch there's little discernible change that can be attributed to its influence (a handful of other startups encourage writers to post short snippets of fiction daily/frequently).

10. Book publishing has never been a technology-adept industry; indeed it is historically technology-averse. This is a challenge for the (minority of) startups targeting existing publishing companies.

The Summary Data

The detail is contained on the attached spreadsheet, but here are a few observations about the summary data collected.

The total funds raised by all 889 startups is only $925 million, not even a billion<sup>2</sup>. And a large chunk of that cash has gone to a handful of companies – Wattpad @ $67 million, Scribd @ $48 million. If counting just the investments at $10 million or less only $220 million has been committed. That indicates a median investment of $1.77 million for those that have been funded at all.

As mentioned above only 15% of the 890 companies have received any funding (some as little as $10k, $30k, or $42k). Nearly a third of the companies on my list (31.1%) are no longer in business.

6% of the companies have managed an exit of some sort: merged or acquired. Rakuten is the big spender: $330 million on Kobo and $410 million on Overdrive (and more recently the German Tolino ebook platform bought from Deutsche Telekom, with Kobo as the “technology partner”). There have been 2 IPOs, Chegg and Digimarc.

<sup>2</sup> Putting that in some perspective, the National Venture Capital Association recorded $58.8 billion in venture capital invested across the U.S. in 2015 (where the investments recorded in this study are a 10-year accumulation).

Where to From Here?

This document is a standalone, a snapshot of the book publishing startup scene in the U.S. at the beginning of 2017. It was fascinating to compile: once I started asking questions I soon wanted to know how many, how much, what kind.

I've been involved with publishing technology startups since the late 1990s, both as a consultant and as an occasional investor<sup>3</sup>. It's intriguing to see how the startup scene has changed in that time.

I hope this report will stimulate some ideas, some conversation, even some new investment. If it can help sharpen a few plans or plant a seed toward another startup I'll be fully rewarded for this effort.

Notes on the Data

1. This list is intended to be authoritative, though it is not complete. The startup listings are drawn from online reports that I've compiled since 2011. Some startups were identified from "The Best of Publishing Start-Ups" published by Frankfurt Quarterly and from Michael Bashkar's "Digital Publishing Startups".
2. Funding data: CrunchBase.com and CB Insights simplified the task of determining funds raised. Most funding "events" are recorded on one or both of those sites. Angellist is another source. Where a "?" appears in the funding column an investment was announced but the amount cannot be determined through those sites or via an online search.
3. Product vs. Company: I generally default to using the product name rather than the company name where the product name is more widely recognized.
4. About the categories: An obvious question to ask is what types of products or services does each startup offer. And so I took a stab at categorizing them. It wasn't easy. The first problem was that the mission of many of the startups is so vague that I wasn't certain how to classify them. The next challenge I found was "OK, I see what it is you say you do, but who would you do that for?" I had the choice either of determining dozens of categories to try to be accurate or a handful of categories to try to be useful. I went with the latter. But as a result lots of companies are very roughly and not very accurately classified. "Tools & Services" is a real grab-bag. Retail includes just about any way of getting a product to market. And so on.

5. Date founded: Startups on this list mostly were launched some time after the release of the first Amazon Kindle in November, 2007 (though mostly in the last 5 years). A few predate this; not many.
6. Country of origin: Most of the startups listed here are U.S.-based. I've included a range of non-U.S. startups, UK/Europe primarily, where that company's business plan includes a U.S./world focus.
- 7: Startups vs. Established Companies: My focus here is on publishing startups, primarily those that serve the book publishing industry in part or in whole. I am not recording investment events of the large and well-established companies. The Penguin/Random House merger is not included, though HarperCollins' BookGig is.
8. Out of Business: When companies go out of business they rarely make an announcement. My assessment of which companies are no longer with us is based mostly on a visit to their web site. In some cases the site has disappeared. In other cases there's been no blog post for a year or two. Often the Twitter feed has dried up or the Facebook posts. If I've falsely declared your company dead, please email me and I'll fix that pronto.
- 9: Summary data: The total funds raised is over $900 million but much of that has gone to less than twenty companies that raised $10 million or more. So I've created an average and median calculation for funding under that level: the median funding of just under $1 million is more representative of the funding landscape than the nearly $7 million average funding.
- 10: General note re data: This information is, inevitably, flawed. In some cases there are double entries, one for the product, another for the company. Some funding and exit data is incomplete. Every week I learn about either a new startup or one that I missed along the way. Nonetheless I stand by the integrity and scope of the list: there is nothing else like it available.
11. Of course, corrections and additions and are most welcome.
